In some regions, fence rows are remnants of forestry that used to cover a significant bit of land. They then become a border between the property when the farmlands are divided, cleared, and separated. Many farmers choose to cut or thin down their fence rows. This can make their farms clean, however, it also comes with some negative points.

Ideally, windbreaks consist of at least three rows. Diversity of tree or shrub choice will yield not only a more visually pleasing outcome, but will increase the disease and insect resistance and enhance the windbreak as a wildlife habitat. The row closest to the wind should be shrubs and the row closest to what you are screening should be trees.
