Azar Gat War in Human Civilization is an excellent deep history of war that extends far back before civilization began and right up to the date of publication. Gat's analysis is biocultural: taking into account evolutionary and cultural strategies and behaviors.

of one of the biggest engagements of the human race: War. The arc of war is long, crooked and thanatotic. The never-likely but always hoped-for result, Mr. Gat argues, is peace, stability and progress -- until the next war at least. It's a big book on big subject, but it can be digested in small repasts.
