What's the Problem with Feminism?

| Mark Manson

While a primary purpose of feminism is to empower women, it does not mean feminists view all women as weak and oppressed. Feminists are not aiming to make women stronger; they already know they're strong. They just want society to see that too. Empowering women does not mean belittling or punishing men.

What is Feminism? Feminism 101 - Red Letter Press Books

No, feminists do not hate all men. Feminism is defined as seeking equality for the sexes, historically by redressing inequities against women. Many try to pretend that “modern feminism” isn’t doing that and are just nakedly advocating for women’s causes to the detriment of men, but in fact an argument that argues that there is institutional sexism through the gender and kinship institutions of patriarchy and male supremacy is in fact more attentive to male problems than in the past ...
